ON WINE - AND WOMEN

Kierkegaard's popular masterpiece about a meeting between five very different men are at a dinner party through the night in turn talks about woman. They are given the truffles, drinking the quality redwine Château Margaux, and get champagne to the dessert.

In the book we meet the five literary figures , the Kierkegaard codenames: Johannes the Seducer and Victor Eremita from Either-Or (1843) , Constantin Constantius and the young man from Repetition - Repetition (1843) , as well as Dressmaker .

The first believes the woman to be comical or ridiculous, the second considers the woman as a joke, as priceless amusement, the third consider women as the weaker sex and believes it to be courteous is a tribute to the beautiful sex, the fourth has as the goal in life to make any woman ridiculous by fashion and the seducer has in relation to women only one unconditional duty: Enjoy life.

One of the Kierkegaard-pen-names has an interesting view on 'coloured' in his speech, as he says...'A coloured man ... cannot be assumed to represent the spirit ... turns green in the face when he gets angry (whish is a physiological fact)'.
(Note: 'whish' is a typo for 'which' in the original text)

The author and philosopher , MA Jens Staubrand has written an introduction to the wine is truth, and has has modyified the work into present-day Danish.
